

Advanced Studies in Human Security

Overview

Over the past twenty five years, conventional understandings of “security” have come under threat. Although the “national security” paradigm continues to dominate the theory and practice of international relations, particularly in a South Asian context, it’s hegemony has been eroded by the emergence of non-traditional security threats (NTST) and by Human Security in particular. Adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 2012 and institutionalized within the UN system through the Trust Fund for Human Security, Human Security is a basic policy goal of many countries. However, definitions of Human Security appear vague and contradictory. Consequently, its relevance to international relations and public policy is limited. This course seeks to critically evaluate some of the tensions which lie at the “vital core” of “security” and to apply different approaches of “security” to empirical case studies. Participants will be introduced to conventional understandings of “security” with reference to the “national security paradigm”. Subsequently, the emergence of NTSTs and Human Security will be discussed. Finally, participants will be introduced to the Critical Security Studies and critical perspectives on Human Security.

Objectives of the Course

The primary objectives of the course are as follows:

- To introduce participants to theoretical debates on security
- To outline different and competing approaches to security: 'national', 'human', and 'critical'
- To get students to research a topic related to the course using empirical examples
- To allow participants to present their informed opinions in class;
- To encourage participants to develop their writing skills by getting them to write up their discussion topics in the form of an essay.
