CBC Paper III: Writing from the Margins

If human enterprise is to be viewed in terms of space (socio-cultural-political-geographical) there will always be the issues on the ideas of 'centres' and 'margins'. Different disciplines see their relations differently: while structural anthropology finds them in constant dialogue and military parlance would describe them as being in relentless war against each other, a philosophical perspective would see them as complementing each other. This paper offers an investigation into the nature of centre-margin relation through the literatures emerging from different parts of the globe which have always defeated any attempt to paint them with one brush.

AECC Paper I: Non Fiction Prose

It won't be an exaggeration to say that the history of human civilization has been the history of 'ideas'. It is in this context, a student of English literature, who has his task cut out to study human life holistically, can't help studying the ideas which informed and shaped not just the literary movements but also the socio-political formulations since ages. Be it the idea of 'unalienable individual right' or of 'liberty, equality and fraternity', or that of 'total revolution', one finds in each a lofty expression of human aspiration that refuses to bow down. Ideas on temporal and spiritual power are as important as the issues concerning modes and manners of human expression. Similarly, the significance of cultural aspects of human articulation can never be understated. Keeping this in mind this paper is organised as follows:

CBC Paper 4: 20th Century American Literature

Twentieth century American society in its first half grappled with the questions of assimilation, confrontation and transformation in the evolving myth of the American Self and the other main issue of the collapse of the U.S. economic system during the Great Depression. The second half dealt with the tensions of culture and counterculture through the emergence of the liberation movements of the sixties. Thus, the literature produced during this period became the rhetorical space for cultural contestation or consensus and can be considered as products of dynamic processes of cultural ferment. This course will enable students to engage with texts not only as products of rhetoric and aesthetics but also as complex hybrid forms of cultural discourse.

SEC Paper 1: Translation: Theory and Practice

Translation plays a vital role in the exchange and circulation of knowledge, practical information and cultural interaction. While good theory is based on information gained from practice, good practice is often based on a meticulously worked-out theory. The two are interdependent and the success of a translation is measured by how closely it measures up to the outlined ideals. This paper aims at putting the practice of translation into a historical as well as a theoretical perspective. It seeks to discuss different aspects of translation and explore its limits and possibilities. The politics of translation “from” and “into” different languages will also be examined during the course of study. Students will also be required to translate a piece of their choice from any language they find suitable into English with the approval of the professor.
